SENSATIONAL ALLEGATIONS.

Charles H. Judson of Rudolph, has filed suit against Jay M. Holdridge in which he makes the startling allegation that under threat of taking his life he was intimidated into signing two notes, in all amounting to $1,540.

Judson and Holdridge were partners in the mercantile business at Rudolph and finally dissolved their business relations, Holdridge taking over the interest of Judson, giving Judson, so the plaintiff claims, his note for $800 in payment for his interests in the business.

Judson claims that while the note was made payable to him it was deposited in the Rudolph bank by Holdridge, and thus he was deprived of its use.

Judson claims that on January 29, 1906, he was invited to the home of Holdridge for the alleged purpose of signing some receipts, and that while there under threat of taking his life he was compelled to sign a note for $840 to offset the note he held against Holdridge and another note for $700, which amount Holdridge claimed was due him for goods stolen from the store by Judson, his wife and sister-in-law.

Judson was later sued by the Rudolph bank on the $700 note, which he was compelled to pay. He now seeks to attach any property which Holdridge may have at Rudolph, and has garnished any money which Holdridge may have in the Rudolph bank. It is claimed that Holdridge has disposed of the store to Napoleon parties and left town. The allegations set up by Judson have caused a great sensation at Rudolph.

Mr. Holdridge has filed his answer, in which he claims that Judson admitted appropriating money and goods belonging to the partnership, and that he freely gave the notes in question, and that upon Judson returning to him his note for $800 that he returned to Judson his note for $840. That the entire transaction on the part of Judson was done freely and voluntarily.
